We are not advised of any change in the law but if there is a change in the law it is highly desirable that the Legislature act to amend said section. However, should there be an amendment of said section the term thereof shall remain as herein set forth." [Emphasis added.] It would seem clear that the foregoing statement is intended as an accurate statement of the existing law with reference to the invalidity of certain provisions of the Act in question and the Legislature should act accordingly. However, we do not feel that we should be forced to usurp the prerogative of the Legislature, in the event that it is desired to enact legislation relating to the matter, as we do not feel that we have authority to issue an advisory opinion. Therefore, we conclude that the invalidity of section 6(2), sub-sections (1), (2) and (3) and section 6(4) of said Act, as herein indicated, has not been determined in this case and that the trial court had jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing below. The other assignment of error, to the effect that the trial court erred in entering a final decree of adoption without requiring a bond to be given by the adoptive parents, is without merit and should not be considered. The orders appealed from are affirmed. WIGGINTON, C.J., and CARROLL, DONALD K., J., concur. Exposure to a Helicobacter pylori antibody-positive mother during early gestation induces gastric atrophy in offspring. Maternal Helicobacter pylori infection is associated with a high risk of gastric cancer in the offspring. Environmental factors could affect the development of gastric mucosal injury and intestinal metaplasia in the offspring. In this study, the effect of maternal H. pylori infection during the periconceptional period on gastric mucosal injury in the offspring was investigated. A total of 66 pregnant women in a low-prevalence area of H. pylori infection were enrolled in this study. 82157476af
